Abstract: The article discusses the impact of corporate governance on the export capacity and economic diversification of Algerian companies. The Algerian economy heavily relies on oil and gas exports, limiting its development potential. The authors emphasize that corporate governance is crucial for wealth creation and the implementation of diversification policies. They adopt a qualitative methodological approach to analyze experiences from both public and private enterprises. The central hypothesis is that effective governance practices can enhance export activity. The authors advocate for governance reforms to strengthen company competitiveness. They also highlight the need to adapt to international trends, such as the shift towards a green economy. Ultimately, they conclude that diversifying exports is essential for Algeria's sustainable economic development.
